How do monkeys store food?

Unlike some animals, monkeys lack a specialized pouch or crop to store food temporarily. Instead, their food moves directly into the stomach for further processing. The monkey's stomach is a fascinating organ. It has a highly acidic environment, which aids in the breakdown of proteins and kills any harmful bacteria that may be present in the food.

Do monkeys have pouches?

Cheek pouches in monkeys can expand to about the size of their stomach when they are filled with food. When they need to, monkeys with food pouches can stuff food into the pouches, and store it there to eat later. The pouches are situated in the cheeks, and expand down into the throat area.

Why do monkeys have cheek pouches?

The characteristic cercopithecine cheek pouches extend down both sides of the neck and are used for storing food. The pouches are very useful if the monkeys are disturbed by predators while looking for food on the ground. With their food in their pouches and hands free, they can escape quickly on all four limbs to the safety of trees and rocks.
